Reports that the Archbishop of Canterbury has said a ‘moment of opportunity’ could be within reach in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict after he met political leaders from both sides during his visit to the Holy Land. Archbishop Justin held separate, hour-long meetings with the Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and the Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas. Later, when meeting the Israeli president, Reuven Rivlin, Archbishop Justin said: “It does seem, listening to many, that internationally perhaps the planets are aligning. Perhaps a moment of opportunity is coming that may not repeat itself for a while. As a Christian, as a religious leader, my hope and prayer is that we can find a way within the region of confidence being rebuilt.” Both Christian Today and the Guardian report that Archbishop Justin also visited the traditional site of Christ’s baptism on the western bank of the River Jordan, which is surrounded by thousands of landmines. Archbishop Justin was witnessing the work of the HALO Trust, the humanitarian mine clearance organisation, of which he is a patron. In a video (See News from the Archbishop of Canterbury, above) Archbishop Justin spoke of how he was inspired by the work of the HALO Trust.
